Learn To Identify Chart Bases To Buy Stocks At Optimal Time

BY DOMINIC GESSEL

INVESTOR'S BUSINESS DAILY

While there is certainly a right time and wrong time to buy stocks, there is never a wrong time to learn how to invest.

You're likely familiar with the adage "buy low, sell high." IBD's research has shown this to be completely wrong. Our methodology is not about trying to buy at the lowest possible price but rather when your chances of success are greatest.

To that end, stock chart analysis is a critical skill. Learning to recognize the classic base patterns is the best way to improve your chances of success.

Base patterns are supply and demand in motion, or in illustrated form. The formation of any pattern begins when existing shareholders are selling. This creates either stalling action in an advancing stock, or an actual downturn into a price consolidation of weeks or months.

Eventually, large-scale buyers start moving into the downtrodden stock. The stock's price will rise and form the right side (recovery) of the base. With enough accumulation, the tension between supply and demand will (hopefully) give way to a stock's breakout to further gains.

Studies of winning stocks reveal several successful price patterns.

The most common are the cup without handle, flat base, cup with handle and the double bottom. Additionally, there are less-common patterns such as the high-tight flag, IPO bases, the saucer, and the ascending base.

When identifying bases, start by determining depth and duration. A flat base can form in as little as five weeks. A cup base needs six weeks. All others require seven weeks.

ServiceNow (Now) began a 14week cup-with-handle base in February 2023. The 14-week base's handle was nearly as deep as the whole base, but still acceptable (1).

Volume dried up as the stock held support at the 40-week moving average for most of the base. Volume returned the following week as investors rushed in and ServiceNow cleared a 485.58 buy point (2).

By late July, the stock had a gain of 26% and began another base. The 15-week flat base (3) was another textbook set up. Volume dried up in the middle before picking up again for another breakout in November (4).

Despite its wavy shape, the pattern's 14% decline fit the mold of a flat base.
